“All of our rescues are equipped with an adequate supply of Narcan to accommodate the calls received, and supplies are restocked as needed at the station or through EMS supply, if necessary,” Evans said.

Since 2021, Dallas Fire-Rescue has administered Narcan to 12, 582 patients. Narcan, also known as naloxone, can reverse the effects of an opioid overdose and save lives if used early enough. It doesn't have any harmful side effects even if it is used on someone who is not experiencing an overdose.

To combat the ongoing opioid crisis, Dallas County Health and Human Services distributed Narcan to nearly 900 businesses across the county over the past eight months.

“In the past, one would work, but now these drugs are getting so strong and so bad, sometimes you have to use two,” Anderson said.

She once had to give a person five doses before they woke up, she said.

Anderson advises everyone participating in the World Cup excitement to stay safe.

“Don't take anything from anybody. You can't trust anything. It could be somebody you trust getting it from somebody they trust, but they don't know who manufactured it or what's put in it,” she said.

Tiffany Stranathan, the Clinical Manager of Substance Abuse Disorders at Metrocare, said she's seeing more youth struggle with opioid addiction.

"The hard part about pinpointing where the opioid use is happening is oftentimes, they will not know that they're using an opioid," Stranathan said. "They think that they're just taking a pill, or they think 'I'm just smoking this vape.'"

According to the National Center for Health Statistics, overdose death rates among teens and young adults saw a sharp decline of 26.2% from 2023 to 2024. Still, illicit labs are manufacturing newer and stronger synthetic drugs at rapid speeds.

Stranathan stresses Metrocare's mission to increase accessibility and reduce barriers to care. In recent months, the nonprofit partnered with Dallas County Health and Human Services to
